Waltz King......Maurice La Belle Claire......Florence Walton . Raiph Herz Irene Franklin have recalled last night that a play with such a name as "Hands Up" was moved from the list of impending pleasures. It went carefully and deliberately into dry dock to receive the attention of Old Doctor J. J. Shubert, who is famous for applying the oxygen and other life savers to debilitated musical comedy. Last night Mr. Shubert took this specimen of his skill out of its bandages and set it up on the stage of the Forty-fourth Street Theatre.

And it proved a sturdy youngster. And it proved a sturdy youngster, altegether able to look after itself. It and it proved a sturdy youngster, altogether able to look after itself. It was very cordially welcomed by the large audience, which found the new piece altogether to its liking. It is amusing, the dancing is of such a quality as to make it altogether the best of the dancing shows, and it is presented with an investiture of unusual taste and the charm. Then, there are the charm, there are the charm the charm there are the charm there are the charm t manded nowadays.

and Joe a Chance at His Hoboken Music Hall.

DANCING A BIG FEATURE THEY STARTED AS IRISH

It may be news to the oldest and best informed of Broadway's first nighters that once upon a time Joe Weber and Lew Fields committed a performance in which Joe and Lew, wearing silk shirts and natty green knickerbockers, clogdanced their way to the centre of the stage, singing :

> We are two Irish lads From far across the sea.

Over at Cronheim's Theatre in Ho alked about in the late spring—or was to the early summer? At all events it Weber admitted reluctantly yesterday, was discussed and it was announced for when told of Mr. Cronheim's death, performance on more occasions than one. And there is a chorus of the freshness of beauty decorner, Broad and Market streets.

He Brought Out Lew and Joe. Nothing was more novel in the first But theatregoers doubtless will re-

Nothing was more novel in the first act than "The Animated Screen," which showed the different characters in the play plotting the theft of the ruby ring, which was the single incident in the play that bore any relation to a plot. The stage seemed in complete darkness, but one after another various parts of it were revealed until the six tableaux had shown all the characters in "Hands Up" working out a part of the story. It was a very ingenious scene.

Then Ralph Herz, being a detective, was disguised first as a dentist, and he heroically carpentered the tooth of George Hassell, who writhed with only the aid and comfort of Irene Franklin, who as the assistant of the dentist helped the patients to suffer. George Hassell was amusing throughout the whole evening because he was more free from exaggeration than actors in such plays usually are.

It was indeed the dancing of Maurice included. But we saw two great autorities of the evening, when here was only chancing to watch, although Maurice had a quartet of young men, Vincent Casaday, Sedgwick Draper, Stewart Gillemore and James Gillespie, to accompany him and Miss Waiton, and there were other dancers in the company besides and cornel and a few others, was populated by men and a few others, was populated by men and certainty which none of the others, and certainty which none of the others possesses; and Miss Waiton is a practice and competent partner. So there is possesses; and Miss Waiton is a practice and competent partner. So there is as much in their dancing to give passure as there usually is.

And their participation in the speaking and singing was, quite harmless, ing and singing was, quite harmless.
